

I want to register my alarm at the idea of weakening current regulations against cross-ownership. This country needs more diversity in media voices heard, not less. The fact that most citizens are unable to throw money at politicians, like Rupert Murdoch and other media moguls have done, shouldn't result in the stewardship of our national discourse being turned over to a small group of billionaires. I'm appalled at the FCC's willful refusal to see the danger inherent in this ill conceived idea. The concentration of the power to control what is heard and read in a few hands is counter to the principles set forth in the First Amendment of the Constitution.
